Leesplezier, a pleasure in reading rich with its evocation of a love of books, has been the governing impetus for this project. So first I would like to thank my teachers for sharing their passions with me. At Yale, it was a privilege and a delight to work with Carlos Eire, Michael Montias, J.J. Pollitt, Eric Jan Sluijter and my advisor Chris Wood. Their guidance shaped many of the themes developed in this manuscript. C.A. van Swigchem was not on my formal committee, but I would have been lost without his advice and unique tutorials with day-long conversations about church interiors in his home as we moved from coffee to broodjes and finally jenever. Susan Donahue Kuretsky, my first teacher of Dutch art at Vassar, will always have a special place in my heart for the way she could get students to put down their pens and just look at an object. In many ways she has been an exceptional “doktormutter.” I have also been the beneficiary of wise counsel offered along the way in less formal teaching environments from Svetlana Alpers, Jeremy Bangs, Nancy Bialler, Celeste Brusati, Jane Dillenberger, Amy Golahny, Ton Harmsen, Elizabeth Honig, Yoriko Kobayashi, Walter Liedtke, Michael Morris, OP, Otto Naumann, Nicolette Sluijter-Seijffert, Ilja Veldman, Lisa Vergara, Lee Palmer Wandel, Mariët Westermann and Arthur Wheelock Jr.

Presence and absence, absence and presence. In a book about absence, there are nevertheless many people whose presence has been critical. I was extremely fortunate to have had the opportunity to continue to learn from senior colleagues in my first teaching jobs at the Department of Art History and Archaeology at Columbia University and the Department of Art History at the University of Chicago, where David Freedberg, Keith Moxey, Rob Nelson, Linda Seidel and Wu Hung stretched my thinking and challenged me at critical points. I have only lived in Berkeley a short time now, but this project might never have come to fruition without the ideas, stimulation and general conviviality of my colleagues at the Jesuit School of Theology, the Graduate Theological Union and the University of California at Berkeley. With a charity and generosity of spirit, they gave me everything I could have wished for in an intellectual home. I will always be grateful to Tom and Sandy Bertelsen Jr for their vision in creating this opportunity for an art historian to grow and learn from theologians. No less important were the students I met at all these schools, whose questions and debate motivated me to clarify what I thought and how I expressed it.

A special debt is owed to the remarkable kindness of the Dutch Reformed and Roman Catholic communities in the Netherlands who shared their objects, buildings and histories. The people I met at the Great or St Bavo Church in Haarlem – Thom Delleman, Steef Kaatee, Aad Peters, Henk and Elly Soetens, Erik and Annie Tjebbes – and the Hervormde Gemeente, Haarlem, were exceptional in their openness, enthusiasm and continued gastvrijheid to a random foreigner who walked in off the street one day.

I have pleasantly whiled away more hours than I would care to admit at the libraries and reading rooms of the Algemeen Rijksarchief, The Hague; Koninklijke Bibliotheek, The Hague; Noord-Hollands Archief, Haarlem; Rijksprentenkabinet, Amsterdam; Stadsbibliotheek, Haarlem; Stichting Rijksbureau voor Kunsthistorisch Documentatie (RKD), The Hague; and University of Leiden Library, Rare Book Room (Dousazaal), Leiden. I am utterly beholden to the many librarians and archivists who shared their treasures with me.

Erika Gaffney has been the most encouraging of editors, instilling hope in dark hours, eloquently advocating on the book's behalf and shepherding me through the mysteries of the production process. Part oracle, part Argus, she maintained a vigilant eye for the tiniest detail and not only went the extra mile, but did so proactively far beyond anything I could have envisioned.

The two anonymous readers of this manuscript lavished time and meticulous attention to make comments that managed to span the broader implications of the book and yet still hone in on specifics of tone and phrasing. Such care endowed the final stretch with a didactic value all its own and made it hard for me to relinquish the manuscript. Jacqui Cornish then edited the book with uncommon grace and laser-like accuracy.

If there are any unsung heroes of the Dutch Reformed church interior surely they are Tjeerd Frederikse and E.A. van Voorden, the photographers whose remarkable eyes allowed the beauty of the objects to be truly seen. Many would have said such straightforward art requires only minimal photography, but they understood, on the contrary, the simplicity of the objects yielded rich opportunities to explore the dynamism of line and abstraction.

It has been twelve years since I began this project, so I would like to express my heartfelt appreciation to the donors and institutions whose financial support allowed a rather unlikely topic to be produced in its best form. This book could not have been published without the liberal support of the Center for Arts, Religion, and Education; the College Art Association Publication Fund; the Historians of Netherlandish Art; the Samuel H. Kress Foundation; the Stichting

Charema Fonds voor Geschiedenis en Kunst and the Stichting “De Gijsselaar-Hintzenfonds.” Postdoctoral work on the manuscript was supported by a Mellon Postdoctoral Fellowship in the Department of Art History and Archaeology at Columbia University and the Theron Rockwell Field Prize for the best humanities dissertation in the School of Arts and Sciences at Yale University in May 2001. Initial research was made possible by a Mrs Giles Whiting Foundation Fellowship in the Humanities, a John F. Enders Research Grant, a J. William Fulbright/Netherlands-America Foundation Fellowship, three Andrew W. Mellon Pre-Doctoral Fellowships, a University Fellowship, three Robert Lehman Traveling Fellowships and the Elinor Wardle Squier Townsend Fellowship from Vassar College.

Lastly, in New Haven, Leiden, Amsterdam, New York, Chicago and Berkeley I encountered many people who enriched this book and my life in countless ways. Sometimes their help was practical and tangible, other times and no less significantly I think of them as providing a general gezelligheid that fostered getting the work done. Thank you Doug Adams, Brian Allen, Victoria Pulling Allen, Nina Edwards Anker, Francesco Benelli, Sebastiaan Berntsen, Emma Cherniavsky, Thijs de Clercq and Bob Ling, R. Tripp Evans IV, Alex and Kathryn García-Rivera, Elizabeth Goldring, Geor and Anne-Marieke Hintzen, Pieter Hans Hoets, Michael Keevak, Rachel Kousser, Huigen Leeftang, Dana Liu, John-Luke and Sam Tsao Montias, Liz Moss, Ernst Jan Munnik and Digna Snouck-Hurgronje, Nadine Orenstein, Romita Ray, Herman Stevens and Rosa García-López, Aileen Tsui, Perry de Valpine, Anne Woollett and Sara Zwart. Then there was the wonderful Cherniavsky family, who on many an occasion provided a home away from home while I was living in the Netherlands and a hospitality of Burgundian proportions at the Chateau du Feÿ. My life would have been very different indeed without Emma’s taking matters in hand at Groton when we were thirteen years old.

But it is to my parents, my brother and my now deceased but still much missed grandmother that this book is dedicated. They first taught me the joys and satisfactions of leading a life well stocked with books, but there are no words to describe all they have contributed to this endeavor.
