

Contents

List of Illustrations	vii
Acknowledgments	xi
Introduction: The Studio, the Domestic Interior, and the Ideology of Separate Spheres	1
The Studio	4
The Domestic Interior and the Ideology of Separate Spheres	6
William Merritt Chase and the Masculine Ideal	7
Mary Fairchild MacMonnies Low and the Feminine Ideal	10
Gendering Artists and Their Subjects	13
1 Working Men and Leisurely Ladies: Tropes of Gender and the Artist's Studio in the Late Nineteenth Century	23
Representing the Artist's Studio	24
Gender Tropes in the Late Nineteenth Century	35
The Studio as a Place to Locate and Read the Artist's Gender Identity	38
2 'The Prince of the Atelier': Negotiating Effeminacy in A Friendly Call by William Merritt Chase	43
The Artist's Studio?	44
Studios, Taste, and the Gendering of Enculturation	50
Domestic Space, Class, and Femininity	54
3 'The Painter will not Sink into the Mother': Mary Fairchild's Nursery/Studio	73
In the Nursery?	74
Representing Women Artists	83
Women and the Unrepresented Studio	86

The Case of Berthe Morisot	89
The Awakening: Playing Out the Possibilities in Fiction	101
The Unexceptional Woman	105
4 Rendering Invisible by Display: Representations of Late Nineteenth-Century American Women	117
Commodification, Signification, and the Feminine	119
Class, Labor, and American Enculturation	124
Agency for the New Woman?	128
Epilogue	139
Bibliography	145
Index	157